The first step in treating patients with prostate cancer is achieving an understanding of the nature of the disease, the diagnostic evaluation, and the treatment options. The purpose of this study was to determine if it is feasible to implement a patient-tailored program for the purpose of educating patients with prostate cancer. One hundred forty patients with prostate cancer were enrolled in a study to be offered a patient-tailored program of education. Eligible patients were enrolled in a randomized pilot study. Patients were randomized to either receiving a patient-tailored health booklet, or to a standard educational booklet. Survey data were collected at baseline and after the education session to assess the feasibility of the study. In the pilot arm, 79 patients (56.4%) received the patient-tailored booklet, and 62 (43.6%) received the standard booklet. Forty-eight (35.7%) men in the patient-tailored group and 37 (53.6%) in the standard group were eligible to read the study materials ($p = 0.034$). Thirty-five (25.0%) men in the patient-tailored group and 16 (23.2%) in the standard group started reading at a later date ($p = 0.73$). Twenty-five (18.8%) men in the patient-tailored group and 19 (27.9%) in the standard group found the booklet useful in planning the care they would receive ($p = 0.21$). Twenty-seven (20.0%) men in the patient-tailored group and 15 (21.7%) in the standard group found it useful in understanding their disease ($p = 0.73$). There were no significant differences in satisfaction with the educational program between groups. The results suggest it is feasible to implement a patient-tailored education program for patients with prostate cancer. Our findings suggest that future research should focus on developing an education program with better delivery methods, including more specific and consistent content that focuses on the issues most relevant to this population. was to select a new person to be her trustee, to take over the trust from the assigned trustee."
